relates generally to electrochemistry and particularly to the synthesis of electrically conductive films, including metal films, and to the applications of these films in electrochemical cells and devices. In the past, electrically conductive films have been synthesized in a number of ways including vacuum evaporation, sputtering, chemical vapor deposition, chemical reduction, chemical oxidation, electrochemical deposition and electrochemical anodization. Each of these synthesis techniques has its limitations. For example, anodization is not appropriate for low temperature synthesis or where conductivity in one direction is desired. The chemical reduction technique is also limited to synthesis of thin films where one or two low index faces of the material must be exposed. Sputtering processes often
