A: You can use the ADB command adb shell input tap 1234 if you set the parameter in /data/local/config/adb { "adb" : { "enable" : { "tap": "1234" } } } you can also read the file /data/local/config/adb you can read the man adb for more command like adb shell which are available in the command prompt adb shell You may also want to read other questions like this How to trigger an android app from the notification area Or maybe you use Android Studio you can trigger an application from the default starter application? EDITED You can use the following command adb shell input tap [tap-number] Also, You can use the adb shell input keyevent [keycode] [key-code-modifier] For example. adb shell input keyevent 22 5 Here we have the keycode as 22 and you can use modifier like shift or alt, so the keycode is 22 and you can use 5 for 5 key. Notice this is a shortcut for the keyboard. You can use it for your home screen. You can find all the codes in the system. Q: How to use pipe to extract the values out from a list of values I'm trying to extract the values for the pipeline created by the merge_by

What's New in the Extreme Translator?

Extreme Translator is developed to be a lightweight and easy to use data translator. It contains a few additional features. It uses SQLite to be able to connect to and create databases. It is also designed to be a standalone application. The data conversion tools and map runner can be used to quickly convert most data formats to SQLite. Extreme Translator has a mapping editor and a map runner that can be used to convert most data formats to SQLite. It also has a command line tool that can use the database to make tabular exports and imports to and from Excel and CSV formats. Extreme Translator is designed to be lightweight and to be a standalone application that will install easily. It supports multiple target formats including SQLite3, CSV, Excel, HTML and XML. Extreme Translator supports SQLite databases containing data in an object array format or in a single record format. They can also be broken down into smaller sub-arrays for multi-table support. Extreme Translator also supports single record, object array and jagged array map formats. Extreme Translator uses the same user interface to create the database as the database creation process. This makes it simple to maintain a default template database and simply change the data format in the database itself. Extreme Translator can create dual maps. Both the data and map formats can be changed. Extreme Translator works in any modern Windows/Linux/Mac operating systems. Extreme Translator is developed to be easy to use and to look the same on all platforms. It uses basic keyboard shortcuts with configurable options to allow the user to work efficiently with the translator. Extreme Translator can be used as a standalone application without any additional graphical interface. Extreme Translator supports the developer toolkit and provides utility functions for the various database objects and maps. This includes an array map for viewing and editing the map and test data collection, an array map writer for exporting all the test data in an Excel file, command line tools for creating and listing tables, maps, and data files, and a command line tool for testing the SQLite database and validating that the database file is connected to the map data collection. Extreme Translator supports on-the-fly database change detection and an interface to clear the map database and restore a default map or database file. Extreme Translator can be used with an existing SQLite database. This provides an easy way to simply change the data format and connect to the database. Extreme
