Q: How to check for syntax errors (Lexical or otherwise) in an input file? We can not always test an input file, at compile time, for correctness, or to detect errors. Sometimes, we may have to analyze the input file in a.txt format to detect these problems. In Haskell, we can use the "parse" module to perform some basic analysis of a text file, but what about C? Is there an C module that allows us to do something along these lines? Basically, I want to know if the following text file is acceptable, and what the C equivalent of the below Haskell would be: `list = [1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6]`

A: Alex suggests the use of `getline` to read individual lines from a file, but that's only useful if you can ensure the number of lines will always be finite. Instead, I think you want to use the `read.c` function, which reads up to `n` characters from the standard input stream and returns them in an internal `char *` buffer. The length of that buffer is returned by the function, and using `strlen()`, you can interpret the result. For example:

#include int main() {

char input[] = "Here's some input"; size_t n =
strlen(input); printf("The input was %zu characters ", n);
printf("The first character is %c ", input[0]); return 0; }
$./a.out The input was 14 characters The first character is H Hope that helps! [Sclerosing epithelial neoplasms of
