Time to share some tips and tricks about getting rid of old posts from your blog. If you've written about a relevant, current event (such as a holiday or a contest), you're more likely to get hits on your old posts than if you write about something timeless. We've found that to get more hits on our blogs, we only write about things we know are still happening. Don't get me wrong, we still write about many events that are past, too, but as you get more popular, you get a lot more attention from brands and other bloggers. Another reason why you should keep some past events in mind when writing about recent events is that it makes your writing sound more current. So, with this in mind, we're starting off with a short list of some of the best recent events we can think of that you should consider writing about. Contests That Are Going On And You Don't Know About Them, Yet Another reason to write about old events is that they're making things happen again. and its similarities with its #1 fan, Markus Pika For those who know my work and trust the community, you know that many of us here have been supporting and speaking out about Reddit's #1 SubReddit Hacker Evolution and its fearless E-Exchange founder, Markus Pika. After a string of fundraising emails from Pika and his company, Hacker Bootcamp, I wrote an article in January of 2013 describing the company and its business model. E-Exchange serves as the tokenised asset used for community members to trade their Talent. The E-Punk (in capital letters for that generation) and there emergent economy has been making a lot of noise on the web since then, and has produced a bounty of unique expressions of the Callings of the community. What started out as a community movement has strong evidence of evolving a deep layered hidden network of trading. Also, many community members are signing up for and selling the courses at Hacker Bootcamp, and the company has decided to suspend it's course with 29 people already completing it. Hacker Bootcamp Explained I have not spoken many words on this topic until now, but my article describing the history and the current journey of the E-Exchange project has drawn a lot of attention from the Hacker Bootcamp community. Even if the market is progressing as I have described in the article, some members of the community are not happy with the progress and wish to adapt the model to fit a much larger audience. The Hacker Bootcamp model is broken up into three parts: Upcoming Training Cycle (Sept 2012-May 2012) Hacker Bootcamp has come to an end, the official 'Gatsby Bootcamp' will then commence. The September-May cycle has signed its first batch of people, by participant numbers, it is roughly equal to the participants of this summer's Hacker Bootcamp. This is a somewhat aggressive training plan, as well as capturing the more enthusiastic Early adopter section of the community now. After this is done, the partner program will train its next section of people who would like to work as a partner and contribute to the project. This means that the transition from now to say the fall of 2014 will be very fast with a much broader base of people being trained. They want continuity in the prime minister, and are not entirely fond of Rudd in his present form. The difficulty with winning elections on third-party tickets can be a nasty and cramped experience, but it can also be immensely satisfying if you are successful. After the Coalition suffered a blowout defeat at the polls, and after the Greens were reduced in numbers, some commentators pronounced it a changing of the guard. The ALP would then assume the role of the third-party in federal politics and the ALP prime minister's role as the Green movement's leader in other parts of the world. But Rudd's leadership is not so much a change in Australian political power structure as the restoration of it. According to the Economist, the ALP is now just three votes shy of its highest point at the 2008 elections. Rudd was adamant, at the time, that he was still the right person for the job. "I will be giving it everything I've got," he declared, "if people will give me the chance." And so far the polls - mid-way through his term in office - are back with him. He won most of the special votes that Labor won in 2008 but he finished just a few points behind the Liberal candidate, who was running as an independent at the time. Is it extreme optimism to imagine that Rudd can recoup even half of this, to bring Labor back with nothing more than a wave of the magic word, but with a more compliant parliamentary party at his back? But that is the sort of nation we live in now. And the mood is changing fast.
