The present invention relates generally to techniques and devices for curing composite resin materials, and more particularly to a system and method for curing such resin materials that includes a reusable insert. The present invention relates to a system and method for curing composite resin materials. Conventional composite resin materials are typically manufactured from a liquid resin that is subsequently cured within a mold or other suitable containment device. Due to the heat generated by the curing of the resin, the inner surfaces of the containment device are frequently positioned in close proximity to a body of water to facilitate cooling. In addition to achieving an appropriate curing temperature within the mold, the design of the mold itself may affect the curing process. For example, it may be desirable to engineer the mold so that it is not distorted by the pressure exerted thereupon during the curing process. Further, it may be desirable to engineer the shape of the mold in a way that facilitates the removal of the cured composite material from the mold. In order to achieve the desired pressure of the resin within the mold and the desired removal of the cured composite material from the mold, the mold typically includes a plurality of mechanical components. These mechanical components often include mechanical springs or the like for maintaining a desired pressure within the mold and for providing a release mechanism for the cured composite material. However, these mechanical components can be difficult and time consuming to assemble within a mold. Accordingly, the present invention is directed to a system and method for curing composite resin materials that includes a reusable insert. In the present invention, the reusable insert is a single use molded base that facilitates the positioning and removal of the mold and the curing of the resin material. Accordingly, in one aspect of the invention, the system for curing a composite resin material includes a mold having a mold cavity; a reusable insert configured to facilitate the positioning and removal of the mold within the mold cavity; and a pressure applying means for generating a desired pressure within the mold cavity. The mold and the reusable insert cooperate to maintain the desired pressure within the mold cavity. According to another aspect of the invention, the reusable insert includes a reusable insert base and a pressure injecting aperture for receiving the mold. According to another aspect of the invention, the reusable insert base includes 6d1f23a050
