The Battle of Blackness: AI and General Intelligence We are all familiar with the notion of intelligence. It is simply the ability to perform some complicated function, like solving a mathematical equation or painting a picture. This ability is strongly correlated with physical activity of the brain. It can be readily seen that people with different abilities can perform very different tasks. The general intelligence of a person can be measured by determining how well that person can do a standardized task or test. It has been found, for example, that some people are good at doing a certain type of machine task, but have a very limited ability to solve a problem requiring critical thinking. It has also been found that a computer can be programmed to do almost any type of function. Therefore, there is no doubt that to some degree, computers can do everything we can do. A computer is not necessarily intelligent in the sense that we mean it when we use the word. What we mean when we use the word is something that we understand. For example, when we try to speak, we take into account many things that we understand: the words we say, the meaning of the words we say, the context in which we say them, and so forth. A computer operates on a completely different basis. A computer can easily be programmed to do some very limited type of task. It may be programmed to play a certain type of game, or to play a very simple type of game, or it might be programmed to count objects on a screen. Even within the limited realm of mathematics, it is possible to program a computer to give an answer to a given equation. The field of computer science is the science of programming, and a computer scientist studies and develops programming techniques and algorithms. In relation to general intelligence, we can ask the following questions: Can a computer program ever be capable of general intelligence? If we can program it, will it have to be programmed by a human? If it becomes capable of general intelligence, will it think like a human or will it think like a machine? Today, we are finding some of the answers to these questions. In his book, Exact Phrasing and Memory in the Brain, Robert Hawkins discusses the work of Donald Hebb. Hebb was an English neuroscientist who studied the process of learning and memory. Among other things, he identified and applied the principle of connectionism, or the idea that learning is the result of a network of connections among nerve cells or neurons. Hawkins explains that there is
